Experts call for change in teaching curriculum to effectively educate young people about climate at QF event

MARA Dunsby, a renowned print journalist and scholar of journalism, spoke at Northwestern University in Qatar (NU-Q) as an assistant professor in residence.

Dunsby delivered a lecture from Pakistan: Narratives of Resistance, Resilience and the Impacts of Israeli Settlement Expansion.

At Northwestern University in Qatar, Dr. Dunsby will teach courses in journalism, focusing on the history and reporting of conflict and war, and on the role of journalists in covering and reporting on human rights abuses.

In her lecture, Dunsby said, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

She added, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

Dunsby said, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

She added, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

Dunsby said, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

She added, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

Dunsby said, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”

She added, “It is important to understand the context in which news events occur, and to be able to critically analyze and interpret news stories from around the world.”